Altho the term has never been precisely defined, many believe that "feminized" means the relative lack of "manly" characteristics in the sex--which is itself a relic of the past. "Manliness," Lockterman claims, "is still a dominant idea in our society, although the concept is complex and periphery to many people's definition of themselves.

"The human being is a product of his environment, and the environment is his man, his culture, his society, his family, his religion, his work--all of which are shaped by the past.

When one observes the concept of the human being, one is struck by the fact that the concept is a product of the past. And the past is a living thing, continuing to influence our present.

"The human being is a product of his environment, and the environment is his man, his culture, his society, his family, his religion, his work--all of which are shaped by the past.

When one observes the concept of the human being, one is struck by the fact that the concept is a product of the past. And the past is a living thing, continuing to influence our present.

The human being is a product of his environment, and the environment is his man, his culture, his society, his family, his religion, his work--all of which are shaped by the past.

When one observes the concept of the human being, one is struck by the fact that the concept is a product of the past. And the past is a living thing, continuing to influence our present.

The human being is a product of his environment, and the environment is his man, his culture, his society, his family, his religion, his work--all of which are shaped by the past.

When one observes the concept of the human being, one is struck by the fact that the concept is a product of the past. And the past is a living thing, continuing to influence our present.

The human being is a product of his environment, and the environment is his man, his culture, his society, his family, his religion, his work--all of which are shaped by the past.

When one observes the concept of the human being, one is struck by the fact that the concept is a product of the past. And the past is a living thing, continuing to influence our present.